CHAPTER II Doctor and Patient--/ Dr. Primrose, from the New Hampshire hills, and Dr. Ely, from Madison Street, met at my house the other night for one of our annual dinner talks on medical topics and life in general. Both my friends were at their best, and kept the ladies long at the table. Primrose held forth for a time on present-day teaching in the universities; and the educators, as the newspapers call them, came in for their usual drubbing. But so many of our harsh criticisms are true, he said. The college corporations are lavishing money on buildings and flower-beds, while the real teachers are starving; and untrained boys are set over the students in the classrooms. Heres a yarn a freshman friend of mine told me last night. It appears that the ambitious fellow has elected a Greek course. His class of twenty are reading the Odyssey. Now, you will admit, Ely, that that gives an unusual chance for the real teacher in these hard-headed days; that is a very great poem, little read of late, about which old custom and tradition have grouped a vast library of some of the most interesting criticism in the worlds literature. Think what the Odyssey has stood for these three thousand years, to the peoples and the poets of the world. So I said to my freshman friend, Good; thats splendid. Its the literature of the gods. Isnt your instructor delighted to have so large a class this year? Does he give you some of his own enthusiasm? Well; no, sir, says my friend, with a grin; his principal interest is to find out how much we use trots. I know, I know, said Ely, with a sad shake of the head. He himself is an overseer of his university. Theres no doubt that the fundamental trouble is with our governing boards; but consider how difficult, or almost ...
