

Letters of John Calvin, Vol. 4 (Classic Reprint)

To William Cecil. Hopes connected with the accession of Elizabeth. Wishes for the establishment of the pure gospel in England. Geneva, 29th January, 1559. I SHALL make no tedious apology, most distinguished sir, for now writing to you familiarly, though personally I am unknown to you; for relying on the information of some pious individuals, who have extolled your courtesy, I trust that you will be naturally disposed to give a favourable reception to my letter, and especially, when, after having perused it, you shall be aware of the motives which dictated it. Since the time when, dispersing the fearful cloud of darkness that had well nigh reduced to despair all pious minds, a new light has miraculously shone forth the fame is rife that you are strenuously engaged in directing the no common influence which you possess over the queen, to scatter the superstitions of popery which have overshadowed your land for the last four years, and to cause the William Cecil, Baron Burleigh, secretary of state under Edward VI., and one of the ablest ministers of Queen Elizabeth. He took a leading part in the convocation of the Parliament, the promulgation of the thirty-nine articles, and the adoption of the different measures which re-established the Reformation in England. He died in 1598. Informed by Peter Martyr of the death of Mary, and the accession of a princess known for her attachment to the Protestant faith, Calvin hastened to offer to Cecil his wishes and counsels.
