

Abraham Lincoln: THE EVOLUTION OF HIS LITERARY STYLE

In times like the present, Abraham Lincoln observed, men should utter nothing for which they would not willingly be responsible through time in eternity. In this succinct and lucid study, Daniel Kilham Dodge surveys the literary sources that shaped the writings of a man whose own utterances are inscribed on Americas cultural memory. Originally published in 1900, Abraham Lincoln: The Evolution of His Literary Style explicates the relations between what Lincoln read and how he wrote. Dodge considers Lincolns reading habits, noting especially his extensive knowledge of the Bible and Shakespeare, and investigates how his knowledge of a wide range of literature - from newspapers and law books to poetry and natural philosophy - influenced his writing. Through letters, poems, lectures, and speeches, Dodge shows how Lincolns distinctive style developed. He assesses Lincolns imaginative engagement with words, traces the sources of his favored figures of speech, and considers how his contemporaries viewed the intellectual side of his character. James Hurts thoughtful introduction enhances this historic reissue, situating Dodges monograph both in the history of Lincoln interpretation and in the context of literary/biographical studies. Hurt also observes the unique position of this work as the first scholarly publication to appear under the auspices of the University of Illinois.
