Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: ...the hard travel, the hours of mental strain during the long sessions, the endless work in placing lantern and sheet, arranging slides and light for the stereopticon, the packing and moving of the apparatus when the day is over, the rushing on to another Field Day on the following morning, when all is gone through again, one realizes that these secretaries are busy, tired men. But this is not the burden that weighs them down--this routine of travel and speaking, and speaking and travel; this is not what saps the vital force and undermines the health. It is the awful consciousness of a work undone, of the fact that after every effort is made, after every dollar in the treasury is sent out into the work, there are still those many towns west of the Mississippi River in which no public prayer is heard; there are still those thousands of people in our city slums who never have known a God; there is still this whole unredeemed country looking to the Christians in it for help--and they so negligent. We Christians see so little fruit, compared with what might be, because of the great lack of unity in our work, not because of lack of strength. The strength of the Christian church is beyond computation; but we give spasmodically--here much, there nothing--and our strength amounts to so little because it is so divided. If the shoulder of the church were once placed against the wall of wickedness in America, that wall would topple over like a wall of clay. If each church member were to give but his one cent a day, there would be no such burden as now weighs on the hearts of the workers. To this end, that our church members may feel and appreciate the need of this unity of force, has the Field Day

been established. AFTER THE STRIKE
The Strike.--During the last two weeks ...
